Henry decides to write down a list of all of the localizable codes from the set of localizable sentences about seeking information about relatives and friends after a disaster in numerical order of the encoding that he has devised.

'Yes, some moving around might be needed later but this will make a good start.' thinks Henry.

'Also, it will show up those localizable sentences that do not yet have a code number and also any gaps that need filling - such as the need to have localizable sentences about the gender of the enquirer.'

Henry starts to produce a list using the codes that he has already decided on previously yet has not written out in full thus far.

'Right' thinks Henry 'that is seventy of the eighty that have already been set out, together with three suggestions for additional sentences, so now I need to write into this document the ten other sentences from those that have already been set out, and check that it is ten and that I have not miscounted.'

Henry looks through the source document, checks what is not yet encoded in the present exercise and copies the ten sentences.

'So here they are - yes there are ten and only ten.'

The telephone number of the enquirer is as follows.

The postal address of the enquirer is as follows.

The postal address of the enquirer is now completed.

The landline telephone number of the enquirer is as follows.

The home landline telephone number of the enquirer is as follows.

The daytime landline telephone number of the enquirer is as follows.

The mobile telephone number of the enquirer is as follows.

The email address of the enquirer is as follows.

Please convey the following message to the person.

The message to the person is now completed.

'So where to encode them?'

'Eight are about the enquirer so they could be put in the group of the format 3137uv and some sort of logical order would be best.'

'As for the other two - where to put them? Do they relate to the person or are they from the enquirer?'

Henry thinks about this for a while.

Suddenly he has an inspiration and looks back at the source document.

'Ah yes, the glyphs designed for those two sentences are clearly related to those for the enquirer and indeed also to a specific subset of those related to the enquirer that are gender neutral. So I will encode them all as relating to the enquirer.'

'Yet which codes?'

'For codes of the format 3137uv thus far I have the following.'

!313791 The enquirer is male.

!313792 The enquirer is female.

!313794 The name of the enquirer is as follows.

'So four left in the 31379v part and so that could be six from another part, ... but is that the best logical structure given that there is plenty of unused encoding space?'

'There are five about telephone numbers, so maybe have them together and separate from the others.'

'One about the email address, two about the postal address and two about conveying a message. So maybe place those in three different groups, partly for elegance now and partly in case there is some need for expansion later.'

'So, how about having the localizable sentences about telephone numbers in 31378v in the order they are now starting from v=1 and going upwards, then having the email address as 313761 and then for the postal address use .... ah, ... if I use 313741 and 313742 for the start and finish of the postal address respectively, then that leaves space for the message passing codes to go as 313751 and 313752 and that is good because the message could be by post or by electronic means and so the message passing sits between the two of them, ... yes.'

Henry writes down the codes in numerical order and adds them into the list.

Henry decides to add some spacing so as to start the list of codes on a new page.

Henry looks through the list of codes and notices that while preparing the list he had added four hyphens at the start of some otherwise empty lines so as to help in finding more easily where to add items. In each such place Henry removes the hyphens, leaving a blank line.

Henry also notices that after three of the sentences in the list - those he is suggesting for addition to the list - he had put four spaces and ADD? so as to note where they are. Henry decides to delete the three occurrences of the four spaces and ADD? from the list, leaving the new sentences as part of the list.
